

Hockey

Altho early information from countries planning to take part in the III Olympic Winter Games led the Organizing Committee to believe that a large number of ice hockey teams would compete at Lake Placid, unprecedented economic conditions all over the world, conditions that steadily grew worse as the closing date for national entries approached, resulted in only four teams entering.

These teams at Lake Placid represented Canada, Germany, Poland, and the United States. The competition was keen; every game was hard fought; and the whole program reflected the strides that hockey has made in the past few years as an international sport, both in popularity and in quality of play.

Each team played the other twice, so that, under this arrangement, there were 12 games on the official Olympic program. Six of these clashes took place outdoors in the Olympic stadium, and six indoors in the Olympic arena.

Because of the limited entry list in hockey resulting from the world-wide economic situation, the International Olympic Committee gave permission for enough exhibition contests to be staged to complete the minimum schedule of 18 games, planned for from the beginning for not less than six teams. There were five games in this series, participated in by the Olympic sextets and the following non-Olympic teams: McGill University of Canada and Lake Placid Athletic Club. Two games, originally scheduled to be played between Lake Placid A C and Canada and Lake Placid A C and U S A, were replaced by one game between a team made up of players from the Canadian and United States Olympic teams and the Lake Placid A C. As a result of this shift the complete hockey schedule consisted of 17 games.

Good spirit was shown by the Canadian and United States Olympic squads in combining for the exhibition game against Lake Placid A C. The Olympic players were all dressed in United States jerseys, only the stockings distinguishing the Canadian players from those of the United States. This exhibition clash was one of the best games on the entire Olympic card.

The final game of the Olympic series, that between the United States and Canada, literally packed the Olympic arena. No one can estimate how many additional tickets could have been sold if there had been any room in which to put the purchasers.

Once again the arena proved its worth in making possible the playing thru of the hockey schedule without any interruption. There were two hockey boxes in the stadium and one in the arena. When weather conditions were against outdoor play, games were shifted to the indoor rink, with resulting satisfaction to the spectators and the players alike. With three hockey boxes available, it was always possible for teams to practice whenever they wished.

The loud-speaker installations at the stadium and the arena made it possible to announce scores and penalties so that the audience could follow the games with the utmost ease. Scores were also posted on large bulletin-boards at both stadium and arena.
